

The Mystery of the Lost Tune

Our teacher played a tune on the tin whistle during music class. It sounded beautiful, but they said they didn't know its name. I raised my hand and said, "I think my grandparent hums that tune sometimes."

That got us curious. We started asking older people in the community if they recognised it. Some did, and they told us stories about traditional Irish music. We found out the tune was written by a local musician many years ago.

Our class decided to bring the tune back to life. We learned to play it on instruments, and we invited people to a music night at school. Everyone clapped and joined in singing. That night, I felt like we'd helped save a little piece of our town's story.
