The Lighthouse Keeper's Stories

When we visited the lighthouse, I thought it would just be about climbing stairs and seeing the view. But then we met the retired keeper, who started telling us stories about storms, rescues, and guiding ships to safety. It was interesting to think about how much people had used the seas in the past. The stories of local people who had been involved with all the boats really made us think about their lives.

Those stories stuck with me, and the next day I was in school I told my class about them, and we decided to write them down. We worked together to create a book, adding drawings and photographs.

We invited the whole town to a reading night at the lighthouse, where we shared the stories. People bought copies of our book, and the money was donated for repairs at the lighthouse. It felt amazing to be part of something that would keep our history alive.
